The Student Fellowship Drive has been reopened! should not be news to any undergraduate that the drive is on the brink of failure; that at this late date only slightly more than 50% of the necessary amount has been contributed.

We feel, after watching the committee plead with a very bored and very unresponsive student body, that the result may not be worth the effort. The value of the Student Fellowship system does not arise from the fact that one senior is enabled to spend a year abroad; it arises from the effort which the be any unemployment all over the Barnard student body puts forth to effect this international gesture. If the money must be "shamed" out of undergraduates, the very purpose of the drive is defeated.

Student Fellowship has become a Barnard tradition. It is a tradition of which we have been justly proud, an accomplishment which we have noted with pride. It must not be allowed to fall into the discard at this time. "Depression"

Noel Coward, playwright, composer, actor and hooser, is packing them in (as is well-known by now) in nine one-act plays of varying lengths and depths. Since it requires three evenings to experience the whole of To-Night at Eight-Thirty, we in this column shall review the plays in penes tres.

Hands Across The Sea is a fast-moving, loquacious, little piece which pokes fun good-naturedly at British provincials as well as at their more sophisticated London brethren and sistren. The plot is conspicuous by its absence, the main purpose being to start off the evening in high spirits. . In this it succeeds. The play deals with a scatterbrained Mayfair couple whose social obligations bring large numbers of people into their drawing-room from time to time. The fact that they hardly know many of their visitors is be-, sides the point: their miraculous powers of memory enable them to acknowledge and recall the names of everyone. Lengthy telephone conversations are held, everyone talks at the same time quite amiably, and the gay host and hostess emerge iresh and radiant from all encounters Their streak of luck is suddenly broken by the appearance on the scene of a British couple whom they once visited in Malaya. These dowdy provincials, played by Joyce Carey and Alan Webb, provide several moments of neartragedy for their unwilling host and hostess Noel Coward and Gertrude Lawrence, who cannot identify them. All ends well, however, and we are left with the feeling that any real acting their members a read.
