SDS Tactics

I read in Spectator recently that the SDS is planning a down eleven percent from last year. It is possible that the SDS has experienced the same situation as an even greater degree. Also, it appears to me that the SDS is going to be abandoning Columbia for other schools at an alarming rate. But perhaps (I hope) that is not the case.

I am writing this letter with SDS in the past by signing petitions against the university's war research on the campus, and NROTC on cam-

If the student vote comes as expected, in favor of students on the Board of Trustees, then the Trustees at their next meeting on April 16 should consider their own responses to these student demands articulated by the Committee on Committees.

The proposals presented by the Committee on Committees are not demands, but merely a request for the approval by the student body for discussions on this matter. The Trustees cannot refuse such a reasonable request if backed by a large segment of the Barnard student body. Hence we urge Barnard students to vote in favor of the proposals by the Committee on Committees, and we urge the Trustees to begin to contemplate of serious discussions with student representatives on the Board of Trustees.

Judicial Council Reform

The recent approval of the Committee on Committees' recommendations for the establishment of a new Judicial Council is a pleasing sign at Barnard. Over 300 girls took the trouble to vote for an issue that will directly involve their interests.

The specific issue which was voted on was a complicated and legal one, and the final outcome of the new Judicial Council concept will not be known until many clarifications have been made. But on one important right has been established, Under the new rules of the Council, the President of the College may reduce or set aside a penalty, the imposition of which has been upheld by the Court of 1971. The defendant has the right to appeal for executive clemency, while there is no mention of the right of the President to overrule a Council decision. It is hoped that the procedures involving this area will follow normal executive powers concerning judicial decisions, i.e. the power of clemency, but no power to override.

The implications of the powers of the new Judicial Council are far reaching. Students will in effect have a majority say on their own discipline, with no interference from the administration. Couple this with growing pressure for student representation on the Board of Trustees and we find that Barnard must be far ahead of other colleges in these areas, while the actual transfer of power would be done within a tight procedural framework.

John, you breathe Ellen/'s lung/'s air. Ellen, you breathe John's lung/'s air. It is not easy to gather air. John's lung/'s air is full, but Ellen's lung's air is empty. Ellen, you breathe John's lung's air. John, you breathe Ellen's lung's air.

The Lesbian

A century after the novel of the real problem of our times, the blacklist is being discussed in this country. The reality of problems of minority groups such as Puerto Ricans and migrant farmers are being discussed. We have recently led the point where some people are beginning to discover that the feminization of society is over, that women have still not won full equality in this country. The State. But the problems of one minority, the "hidden" minorities are still quietly ignored.

The Columbia Women's League, whose purpose is to aid each student in adjusting to our society, has suffered a curious blacklisting in student publications this year. The Columbia Spectrum has deliberately ignored and refused to cover gay activities. The Bulletin needs to have followed the same policy.

It is not true that the lesbian does not have any problems on campus. The college years are the very years when the lesbian is seeking to make the discovery of who she is. And it is no one to turn to for advice. She does not go to her dean or counselor or her advisor with this problem. The other girls are talking about men. She is only talking to her own family or is frequenting her hairdressers. Her social life is limited by the lack of facilities where she can be herself.

She may feel a strong drive to lead a life which is unnatural to her, she may feel aided and abetted by the honest workers of her own earnings in the future. She may feel that a strong drive to lead a life which is unnatural to her, she may feel aided and abetted by her own earnings in the future.
