

New Administrators Join Staff

By ROSE SPITZ
This year Barnard has three new members of its administration; they are Mrs. Lavinia Calendar, Mrs. Hirtz, and Miss Jang D. Moorman.

Mrs. Calendar is the Assistant to the Dean of Faculty, a position that Barnard's President, Miss Martha Peterson, has called the "Director of Human Resources." Mrs. Calendar's role is, as she says, "to serve as a resource." Barnard, its students, administration, and alumnae in exploring Barnard's role in New York City." She is available for assistance in setting priorities in projects relating Barnard to New York and in program ideas.

Mrs. Calendar, a niece of Barnard, formed the first citywide parents' group concerned about quality education. She was a consultant to the Juvenile Program, which brings bright youngsters from rural, backwoods communities to live with northern families and get education.

Through a young program, it has been very successful for its recruits are now in college.

Mrs. Calendar was also an associate fellow of Kenneth Clark's Metropolitan Applied Research Corporation, an organization of scholars, primarily in the social sciences, concerned with research, evaluation, and action programs that relate to the problems of the city. She is involved in HARRY, Harlem Neighborhoods Association, and the New York Mission Society.

Mrs. Hirtz, Director of Development, will handle large fund-raising drives for Barnard. In the past the emphasis of Barnard's fund-raising drives has been on asking individuals for contributions. Now, however, Mrs. Hirtz says, the drives will concentrate more on foundations and corporations. To do this, Barnard will need, to have specific projects and programs to present to these large organizations. Mrs. Hirtz will work with the faculty to determine what these projects and programs will be.

Mrs. Hirtz attended Swarthmore College and then transferred to Barnard. She was at Parents Magazine for seventeen years, and was managing editor for the last twelve. She developed a strong interest in women's education while working on the magazine.

Miss Moorman, Assistant to the President, will work with the new committees of faculty, students, and administration that were set up last spring. These committees deal in such areas as housing, curriculum, and student projects. Miss Moorman will also work with the trustees, alumni, and administration in determining policies dealing with housing and financial aid.

Miss Moorman is a graduate of Austin College in Texas, and also received an M.Ed. from the University of Missouri, and a Ph.D. in Educational Psychology and Guidance from the University of Kansas. She has served as Associate Dean of Students at Austin College; Instructor in the School of Education; and Counselor Guidance Bureau at the University of Kansas; Assistant Professor, Counseling Psychologist, and Assistant to the Dean of Student Affairs at the University of Wisconsin. Her most recent post was that of Assistant Dean of Student Affairs at Wisconsin

Convocation Opens Year

A spirit of optimism prevailed over the convocation ceremonies last Thursday to officially open the 96th academic year at Barnard. Speakers in the rather brief ceremony focused on innovations at Barnard, characterizing the school as a "progressive" center of education.

Addressing the audience of approximately 250 students, Dean Henry Boose apologized for the delayed completion of Plimpton Hall and set the date for the completion of the science center for the fall of 1969. Following Dean Boose's greeting, Dean Bailey, Dean of Studies, and Miss Wagoner spoke respectively on new Phi Beta Kappa members and the "self-college" government to be implemented this year.

In her convocation message, President Peterson considered the "nature of a college community and the roles of its members." She emphasized the need for students to look beyond the academic gates of the college to the cultural opportunities in New York City. The President urged students to become involved in the politics of 1968, to work for an 18 year old voting age, "to act within and outside the college campus." Considering the innovations at Barnard, Miss Peterson concluded her address by quoting Professor Kouwenhoven, a member of the Barnard English Department: "Abundance and waste are necessary in a democracy. Let us use our abundance wisely so there will be minimal waste."

Grad School Aspirants Urged To Plan Ahead

Students returning this fall who are considering graduate school should be sure they have fulfilled all the requirements in advance. Among other things, many graduate schools now require scores from the Graduate Record Examinations. This test is offered on October 28 and December 14 in 1968 and on January 18, February 22, April 26, and July 12 in 1969. Individual applicants should be sure that they take the test in time to meet the deadlines of their intended graduate school or graduate department or fellowship agency. Early registration also ensures that the individual can be tested at the location of his choice and without having to pay the three dollar fee for late registration.

graduate schools or fellowship committees which of the examinations they should take and when they should be taken.

Full details and forms needed to apply for the GRE are contained in the "Bulletin of Information for Candidates." Students may obtain the booklet by writing to the Official Testing Service, Box 985, Princeton, New Jersey 08540; 990 Grove Street, Evanston, Illinois 60201; or 1947 Center Street, Berkeley, California 94704.

Shakespeare Reading Opens MLP Season

SALMONS IN BOTH, a reading for two players adapted by Alfred Hyslop, is the first production of the Fall Session of the Barnard College Theatre Company. It opens for the public on Thursday night, October 17, in Minor Latham Playhouse, Broadway at 119th Street, and will run through Saturday, October 19. The production features Alfred Hyslop and Kenneth Jones as the two readers.

The subtitle, "Shakespeare's Warriors Talk About War and Peace," best explains the substance and structure of this original adaptation which will have its world premiere in these performances.

Student performances on October 15 and 16 are at 4:00 P.M. Thursday's performance is at 5:00 P.M. Friday and Saturday (October 18-19) performances are at 8:30 P.M. There is no admission charge. Due to a limited seating capacity, reservations are confirmed by calling 286-2079.

Revolution May Cause Growth

By BETSY TRACY
Frequently when a crisis develops on the Barnard or Columbia campus the administration and students appeal to Prof. Son Larson of the Philosophy Dept. who acts as a medium between the students and the establishment. Prof. Larson was available shortly before classes resumed to express comments on the strike last spring and on the Corder Administration.

Prof. Larson was actually quite hopeful about the Corder Administration. "The new administration has at least one quality which is to be laudatory, which was not true of the Kirk Administration." An example of this was the charge concerning the use of McMillin Hall by SDS last week. "This could not have happened if Kirk had been President," commented Prof. Larson.

When asked to reflect on the effect of the student strike last spring, Prof. Larson said it was hard to stress on significant changes since "no very good things came out of it." She feels that the crisis created a sense of serious consciousness among people who had previously been fairly isolated. She has noticed a profound effect on many people's lives: "It has made them more serious about their politics, academic work, and relationships." "I hope very much that this sense of community and serious concern with the qualities of our lives will be continued and sustained. It would certainly be a good thing if it could last."

SDS is still asking for the Administration to grant the Six Demands. Prof. Larson said that last spring she felt that the gym was the most important demand. She does not think that the gym will be built, but, "of course," she said, "there has been no indication from the Administration that it will not. I'm just going on trust that it will not be built."

Prof. Larson, continuing to discuss the Six Demands, said that during the crisis, amnesty became the crucial issue. "I think to create an atmosphere of reconciliation at Columbia the Administration should grant amnesty; it would have a tremendous and wondrous effect." Prof. Larson explained that she is wholeheartedly in favor of amnesty because there is no way penalties can fairly be passed out. Since the responsibility for those events was very widespread, amnesty should be granted, said Prof. Larson. "As a forgetting for practical purposes." Amnesty would also be expedient in establishing a rapport with the alienated members of the university.

Prof. Larson said, "I'm even though there is a new president there are no dramatic changes with respect to who has power." She repeatedly said that the changes at Columbia will come gradually since at the present Columbia is the only significant university which has not changed.

Library Announces Later Hours, No Reserve Line

In an effort to maintain a library schedule that conforms more closely to students' needs, a new library schedule will be tried on an experimental basis this year.

LIBRARY SCHEDULE 1968-1969

Monday through Thursday	8:45 a.m.-10:00 p.m.
Reserve Rooms only	8:45 a.m.-11:00 p.m.
Friday	8:45 a.m.-5:00 p.m.
Saturday	9:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m.
Sunday	2:00 p.m.-10:00 p.m.
Reserve Room only	2:30 p.m.-11:00 p.m.

This change means that the Reserve Room of the library will be open to eleven o'clock in the evening, Sunday through Thursday. As in the past, the schedule of extended hours will be in effect at appropriate times during the examination period.

Another operational change concerns the reserve book line. Reserve Books have been ordered in sufficient quantities to eliminate, hopefully, the need for the reserve line.

BARNARD bulletin

Published weekly throughout the college year except during vacation and examination periods, by the students of Barnard College, at the students of the Barnard Community. Entered as second class matter Oct. 19, 1928, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

When McCarthy Flowers Wither On The Fender...

October, and the only sign on campus that 1968 is an election year is the ghostly presence of McCarthy flowers on the sides of cars. The political enthusiasm of early spring has been extinguished but by hit; first Robert Kennedy's assassination, then McCarthy's defeat at the Convention, and above all the unpardonable police repression in Chicago have stamped out student interest and involvement in the presidential race.

Understandably, students have become disillusioned with the election that was predicted would "return our youth to the mainstream of American affairs." Instead of electing, political energies are diverted into University politics, like the pointless conspiracy to vilify acting-President Cordier. Other students have thrown their attention to the Javits-ODwyer senatorial contest (a kama-katter battle in which a good candidate is fated to lose, no matter which side wins).

We hear from time to time the question: "Who are you going to vote for this year?" The answer: "Does it matter?" It does.

Admittedly, the presidential campaign is absurd, grotesque, a throwback to the style and rhetoric of the turn of the century Humphrey and Nixon, Tweedledum and Tweedledee, running on identical platforms of "law-and-order" and "prosperity" offer little to fire the liberal imagination.

However, although the election may seem to offer the voter no desirable alternative, there are a number of extremely undesirable alternatives. If the pollsters' predictions are correct, we may find Nixon in the White House, with George Wallace as runner-up. If that does occur, then Richard Nixon will have a clear popular mandate to veer to the extreme right and to overturn every progressive step that has been made since 1960.

If liberals sit on their hands and sulk, then the election will be decided by the votes of the right wing. So it does matter whom you vote for in 1968, or at least whom you vote against.

Impressions Of England

By DAVID LEHMAN

David Lehman, a junior at Columbia College, has just returned from a summer of study at Oxford University. In the following article Mr. Lehman offers an impressionistic view of England and its people.

The English girls have nice legs. They say "stagnantly..." of the very American say "well..." When you're hitching they know you're American before you even say a word. They open the car door and say "welcome, America" with a smile. After they warmed you up, the first question would always be "do they really shoot each other in the street in America?" and you'd sheepishly say "yes" and guiltily try to qualify that for the next ten minutes. They asked about the Negroes in America, but always avoided the war unless you brought it up. They were all against the war and you were embarrassed explaining how all the students in America were against the war but... there was very little you could do to guess they never asked because they were afraid of arguing with an "aggressive American."

You'd mention how you loved England just to say something to the lonely guy and complimentary him or something mysteriously psychological but you would laugh at yourself for doing it... It made hitching into such a business. And the English seemed very candid and factual, thus cutting. But no hate. Many of us rarely hate Johnson. Nearly everyone in England thinks Wilson merely pathetic.

In Oxford during the summer it rained almost every day. But it was small rain, you expected it and then it stopped. There were many students, flowers, meadows, and old buildings. I have this thing about flowers. When you picked up a rose right after the rain with the rain water still coating its black red unopened body...

Somehow you always seemed surrounded by Americans. Students for the summer, or just passing through, or students who'd been there for a year, or a novelty expatriate. After a while you realized that despite your imminent return ticket, you were kind of an expatriate as well. I lived in Oxford for barely seven weeks, but I found myself testing the college, the restaurant, the English people and young people, the ground itself for a home. It was good not to have to read a newspaper for seven weeks. That's what Oxford does to you. If you're a writer you can look at a year's accumulation of feelings, and put them in a perspective and get them on paper, which is sometimes impossible.

in pressured NYC. Be it escapism or necessity relaxation for emotional survival, I loved it. But it would probably ruin your mind if you did it for a year.

There are about ten varieties of beer in England, all of them warm. It was always "a pint" of bitter or a pint of shandy, and if you asked for "a shot" of brandy or anything, they demanded to see your Texas holster or they wouldn't serve you but laughed.

Everything is cheap in England. You are so enchanted with prices and devaluation the first days over that you eat lunch and dinner for ten shillings each and think you're happy. Then when your stomach reacts and there's better food at six shillings you know better. And then your carion of Marlboros runs out. You experiment for a week and get stuck on Rothmans', Woodhues, Players, or Embassy, which are all evil — you cough like crazy thank god at least they're small. Never eat breakfast in England. Fish and chips is all right, and the coffee is drinkable.

Hitching to Cambridge were dropped off in front of a long weed field of grass and weeds so deep that the women walking into it seemed buried and all you could see was the color of their clothing, not even their faces or arms, like a Mopet painting. At the end of the field was a heiky small red brick castle which was a church. I pointed to it and said, "that's the middle ages." It hit you all of a sudden that everything in this country is still living in the past.

A literature professor at Leeds told me that he believed it takes only one to five people to paralyze an institution. That's why American grad students coming over this year, especially from Columbia, are much feared. Both Leeds and Horneyer art school had sit ins last term, but both on matters far more parochial than Columbia's. At Oxford there was a one-day demonstration against "proctor control" of distribution of leftist literature. The students in England don't grip the way we do. Perhaps they have it better sentimentally with regard to their own living conditions they do. Perhaps there is the unique Englishman's combined sense of relaxation and complacency. Perhaps they know too well that England is net in the vanguard of world politics.

It's funny, but so much of the well-known stuff about England is true — bad food, rain, flowers, no central heating, spazzatura and politesse. There is nothing new under the sun. But to see, to experience, the things you've always seemed to know but were always far away is itself a mind exploding experience.

Radical Party Organizes

By ALISON KILGOUR
The Peace and Freedom Party offers an opportunity to students to participate in the work of an electoral politician; the opportunity to help build not only a national grass-roots party, but a political direction for that party as well. Because its membership (including those legally unentitled to vote) determines its policies, it offers the chance for disgruntled people who believe in the electoral system or not, to develop a tool which they can use in the way they feel is most effective for building a mass-based movement that could eventually bring about radical changes in the political, economic, and social structure of the U.S.

In order to build on a national level, the Peace and Freedom Party, which is now all of a year old, nominated Edith Green, author of Soul on Ice, Minister of Information of the Black Panther Party, and senior editor of "Tampara," for the office of President and Judith Mages, former president of the Social Service Employees Union, for Vice President. Both are campaigning vigorously to reach all voters, but for two ends; first, to unify the forces of opposition to the present power structure into a national, democratically-centered, grass-roots movement which allows radicals to work in all areas of struggle, from the electoral process to the streets; and second, to provide a real alternative to the three major "choices" with whom the voters are faced this November — to allow the disenfranchised not only to register their disapproval of the Johnson-Humphrey regime, but to register their affirmation of a set of principles equally opposed to the far right wing of our society.

Besides nominating national and local candidates, the party chose a platform and set of policies. The candidates were black, Mexican-American, Puerto Rican, and American Indian liberationists; community leaders of the community, (whether it be the ghetto which is currently besieged with what amounts to an occupying force of policemen, or the university in the community) or the university, where students have no say in decisions that affect their lives; and other oppressed workers in their struggles for justice and control over the institutions that affect their lives; an end to Selective Service; and an end to strings-attached U.S. economic aid to foreign countries. The party guidelines decided upon state that PFP be an independent permanent radical political party, permanently separate and distinct from any other party, and that the party should be organized in a loose, democratically-oriented structure that allows local clubs a considerable degree of autonomy and independence. It has a considerable voice in the decision-making process of the party as a whole. At the statewide convention in New York, the New York State Peace and Freedom Party voted to form a coalition with the Black Panther Party, which already had a coalition with the California Peace and Freedom Party.

Much of the summer was spent in a petition drive to place Peace and Freedom on the ballot in New York and other important states. In the course of the drive several clubs were founded in upstate New York. Local candidates are: McReynolds of the 10th C.D., Harry Drexler of the 63rd A.D., and Barbara Lawrence of the 69th A.D. will be on the ballot; but although 20,000 signatures — 8,000 more than the number necessary to place a candidate on the ballot — were collected, Edith Green and Judith Mages, their place on the ballot is being challenged by an upstate Republican on the grounds that the two candidates are not of legal age to hold the offices for which they are running. The case is being fought in the courts, and the likelihood is high that there will be a Peace and Freedom line on the ballot in November.

The Peace and Freedom Club of Columbia was inactive during the summer, but a new club is being organized this fall. A general organizing meeting will be held Thursday, October 3 at 8:00 P.M. in the auditorium of Earl Hall for old members and all those interested in joining the party; the discussion will center on the role of the club in the national and local campaigns and in the university community.

Columbia Studies African Law

Recent legislation on federalism in Nigeria; the protection of wildlife in Botswana; the conduct of public officials in Kenya; price controls in Somalia. . . These are subjects covered in a few of the nearly 18,000 items entered to date in the African Law Digest — the heart of the work of the new African Law Center at Columbia University.

Created three years ago, the Center today has become the country's principal reference source on legislation which is shaping the development of the emerging nations of Africa. It is trying to offset what its director calls "a failure in the legal profession in the United States regarding African law." There is no clear realization that law in Africa is a major tool for social change, an expression of government policy, and a means of communication. . . states A. Arthur Schiller, professor of Law at Columbia and director of the Center.

Since its establishment in January 1965 under a Ford Foundation grant, the Center's reputation for research into African law has grown steadily. It is the only institute of its kind in the United States. Professor Schiller defines the Center's primary goal as the "dissemination of information," and the African Law Digest is its most important undertaking. A quarterly journal, the Digest catalogues all current legislation by nearly all African countries.

"A revolution is occurring in Africa, and law is part of what's happening," says Oswald W. Rhee, editor of the Digest and associate director of the Center. "Legal systems are practically transformed overnight."

The items in the Digest are drawn from the government gazettes and official publications of the African states. The Digest provides complete summaries of legislative enactments — mostly pointed and concise, yet occasionally more detailed when warranted by the importance of the subject. Certain major documents are published in full. Through its system of citations, the Digest is particularly valuable as a reference to official source material. The United Nations, for example, possesses official African publications, but uses the Digest to locate materials.

There are other projects which the Center is undertaking. This summer a group of six African grad students and one Columbia under the Center's sponsorship before returning to their own countries. They participated in the Digest's major program to encourage the preparation of teaching materials for use in African universities. The participants themselves, under the Center's guidance, worked on the formulation of materials.

For the future, the Center has the publication of a magazine separate from the Digest to be called "African Law Studies." It will deal with subjects under the Center's aegis and serve basically as a research tool in the field. There will be comparative studies of African legal systems.

Salacuse is the Center's full-time administrator. He assumed the position in January 1967, and has held it since the Center's establishment.

Senator Javits

Javits Runs Again

In his third campaign for the Senate, Republican Jacob Javits is campaigning in an upward-frenzy. In a grandstanding position. As a senior senator, he is practically obligated to support his party's presidential candidate; yet he does not agree with that candidate's policies.

At a recent conference for student leaders and editors, Senator Javits tried to explain his position: "You should vote for me," he said, "because if Nixon wins in the Republic you will not get any more of the things that he presents." And commenting on Spiro Agnew, "Mr. Agnew is certainly not all politics, but we must allow him the capacity to learn. It is common knowledge that a person improves when he is in office."

Although not as candid as his Democratic opponent, Javits does impress one as an honest man. Unfortunately, Javits said that he would not be in the Senate. O'Dwyer are engaged in a contest for the party's nomination. The Senate could certainly use them both.

Janes Revamps Course In Play Production

By PEGGY NELSON
Practicing his belief that a course should not remain the same year in, year out," Professor Kenneth Janes, with Mr. Donald Pace, has completely restructured Barnard's English 33, "34 'Play Production'."

The new approach to the study of the technical aspects of the theater—costumes, lighting, set design, properties, set construction, publicity, make-up, theater management, and scene design for television production — will emphasize the viewpoint of the playwright, the director, and the actor. Professor Janes is particularly interested in the new plan to have professionals work directly with the students. Specialists will teach the series of classes that pertain to their individual fields. Guest lecturers include Mr. Thomas Keister of the American Costume Company on costumes and Miss Katherine B. Woodman, professional lighting designer, who has often worked at Minor Latham Playhouse on special productions, on lighting. Mr. Donald Pace, the Assistant Director of the Latham Playhouse, will coordinate the course and present interpretive classes in a survey of the history of theater, including the history and practical aspects of the theater, theater dynamics.

English 33, 34 is a two-semester course and it is advisable to register for both semesters in order to benefit fully from this new approach. Students will be required to work the equivalent of two hours per week on Minor Latham productions. Open to all the schools of Columbia University, it is necessary to obtain written approval before registering for the course.

O'Dwyer Makes His Bid

The O'Dwyer campaign has arrived at Barnard. By now you may have noticed our booth in Barnard Hall besides booths in which we sell literature (which we absolutely give away), and lots (which we permit you to sign), we can also give you information on how to register to vote, or tell you why we think Paul O'Dwyer's candidacy is so relevant to 1968 and so important for the future.

We were to give information and to find people interested in working for O'Dwyer. We'll also be selling tickets to a rally in support of O'Dwyer candidates for the Senate. It will be at Madison Square Garden on October 28th invited speakers include Gen. McCarthy, Ted Kennedy, George McGovern, Julian Bond, John Collins, Harold Hughes, and Wayne Morse — in short, the most prominent members of the McCarthy-Kennedy wing of the Democratic Party. Tickets are $2 and $5 each.

What is there to do for O'Dwyer? Well, on campus you can sign up for a shift at the rally or volunteer to make posters and help out in organizing fund raising projects at Barnard-Columbia. Or, you can man tables on Broadway, do work for the campaign in the area. We are working with a similar group at Columbia (their table is out on Low Plaza) and other O'Dwyer groups in the community.

Interested? Or maybe even a little bit curious? You can find out more about O'Dwyer any weekday at our table in Barnard Hall 70, or contact Gya Storck '70, SM 267

Jobs Available For Students

By REBECCA COOK

Are you looking for a part-time job? The Barnard Placement Office is willing, waiting, and eager to serve you in your search for work. Mrs. Barbara Collins, Assistant Director of the Placement Office, explains the range of the part-time jobs, explained there are many possibilities this year with noticeable increase in salaries.

The jobs vary from "working" to laboratory research, on campus as well as off-campus. They are categorized as follows: child and pet care, clerical, sales, tutoring, typing (65 wpm minimum). The jobs are either permanent, part-time or temporary. These are advertised in the bulletin board outside the Placement Office. Mrs. Collins said that this fall would be a good time for part-time jobs because of the political campaign; two Barnard students have been recently placed with the Democratic Party in the campaign and with Senator Javits's campaign.

If your interests are not in politics, the publishing world might be appealing. There are time jobs in publishing as clerical, but they sometimes involve proof-reading, and possibly writing. These are the part-time jobs these jobs have led to interesting summer jobs.

Laboratory work is popular for on campus, as well as for off-campus jobs. A student with a speaking knowledge of French was recently placed in the library of the French Institute, for they were looking for a good background in either language or math, the Tutoring Service at Columbia might be a good possibility.

The types of temporary "spot" jobs available vary widely in kind. Hostessing at the New York Convention Center, or working as a waitress while living in the owner's apartment are just a few of the many possibilities. It is important for people to look at the book of the types of temporary jobs available in the area. Mrs. Collins stressed that right now, the demand for jobs is great, so the board might look bare, but a savvy job seeker as the most unusual jobs available in the middle of the semester. Modeling is a good opportunity of the types of temporary jobs that occasionally appear on the board.

Among Mrs. Collins's many ideas was a possibility of initiating a group of students to help with children's parties. For example, puppet-shows, playing a piano or a guitar, or putting on a skit. There are many more ideas, and there is a demand for this kind of work.

ZOCKER—a column about the arts

By LINCOLN SWADOS

Hopeful that last week's column turned your wretches heads, I shall talk on The Staple Singers' album concerns my next about Gospel with a short detour into psychedelic lighting. Please bear with me and we may all land with our heads up.

Friday, September 20th, I went to see a famous Gospel Group, The Staple Singers, at The Fillmore East, Second Avenue and Sixth Street. The lighting at this theatre is done by the Joshua Light Show, so fascinating that I cannot pass them by.

The Joshua Light Show is the first psychedelic lighting that I have seen that actually cares about people. The lights are projected from behind on a screen and they do very funny things and they don't do obvious things. For example, when Carla and Her Beacothorns announce a Western song, the lights don't turn a reddish, they squeeze and stretch and pulsate into something that feels Western and brings out the best in Carla. This is the work of men who are imaginative and well-versed in the field where the idea is generally to delude you with very simple lighting tricks. If you did the psychedelic scene in my opinion this is the place to go. Joshua White, Kip Eichen, and their coworkers have made a major breakthrough on our stage. Turn off every light except your study lamp and the idea spun around until you feel sick and save yourself a trip to the Electric Circus or the Cheetah.

However, that is not related to The Staple Singers and the electric world of Gospel. They need no light behind them, aware them, or between them. Their light shiner from inside and it shines out clear, clean and true. There are four of them: Pervis, Fervis, Mavis, and Cleo (Nobody calls my grandfather "Pop" except his family, but that's Mr. Staples business). Pop accompanies on an electric guitar. No turning before the audience. No tripping over a cord. No fumbling with a capo. And the man is a hand unto himself. You don't even know the guitar is there and it's all over the place. They start slow and quiet. Where's the joyous shout of gospel we heard at Martin Luther King's funeral? Haven't they got it in them? Of course not. That's why they're out at colleges and on the Hippie scene and not among their own, and their voices reach for the stars, but like a good group they don't give it all right away, and they respond to the beat of the audience. Pop's nights that I saw them, it wasn't until the last few measures of their second song that we heard the soft loud wall from the guitar field and the ghetto, Mahalia Jackson's "Dear God, I am a man" I can sing!" I sing, therefore I am.

With their third number, they swung into a muted and original cross between the thunderous, hand-clapping beat of hot gospel (the beat of "Help! Help! Help!") and very quickly, over and over and over. The beat of banging your head against the wall, the beat of shouting for mercy, of shouting for joy, and the beat of hard rock which is too hastily worshipped. (If the Beatles really knew what they were doing, I think it would be easier on us all) This is a new and different tightrope on which the Staple Singers walk with spirit, dignity, and confidence; and the audience rose to the beat. Mavis, the sizzling lead singer, glowing like a candle, was gratefully lifted from the stage into the audience, where she clasped our hands; invited us to clap, to sing, to "love each other." Pervis did not come on strong until "John Brown," which he did with mantles, commitment, and folk-rock charisma. Cleo, who is softly beautiful, sings along with the clarity of a chime. The night that I saw them, they could have sung it down, but they left us exalted and incomplete, making way for the last act on the bill. They spoke with me most graciously afterwards. The seed of their singing is an honest Baptist faith, but they like people just digging their music in the room while we talked were their New York relatives, their manager, two girlfriends of hers, a man from Sepia and a fellow, with an African shirt from Italy and his semi-conscious girlfriend. And the mood was appropriately congratulatory; Pervis spoke with his resignation because he stays up all night, lies on the floor, stares at the ceiling and writes songs. Pervis spoke with his resignation because I am white.

Cleo touched me; speaking of the family, how her father origi-

Walking Down Their Streets

By MARION BERG

WALK DOWN MAH STREET is a pleasant and even an exciting show but a mixed experience. The musical revue, assembled by the young and imaginative Next Stage Theatre Company, offers a loosely connected series of songs and comedy routines centering on the theme of "life in the slums." The topic is hardly a jolly one, and the mood is full of discontent on many counts: racial discrimination; the callous impersonality of welfare and housing agencies; cockroaches and piles of decaying garbage; the inequity of slum schools.

Yet the seven performers succeed in turning this discontent and bitterness into an entertaining and appealing whole; it's a clever trick, and it's fun to watch the cast as they win over the audience. The predominantly white and middle class audience smiles and laughs, enjoying a feeling of camaraderie with the cast, only intermittently aware that the entire social structure is under attack.

The seven young actors represent a spectrum of skin color ranging from lily-white to tawny Puerto Rican to the basic black. (As the white members of the cast sing along with the Negroes about their black identity, it's hard to tell whether this is a conscious stage device or paranoid schizophrenia.) The actors do a surprisingly good job of projecting individual personalities, without the supporting structure of dramatic personas supplied by plot. Their talent and enthusiasm buoy up the show and covers up several weak spots in the revue.

One technique that the performers use to good advantage is the "mingie" tactic; that is, the actors draw members of the audience onto the stage, shake hands and dance with the audience, and sometimes speak directly to the audience, showing their awareness of the spectators out in front. Although we've seen the technique in many "new theater"-type productions, it's seldom been incorporated in such a natural and unself-conscious way. The effect is to sweeten the dose of anger and hostility that often runs through the lyrics and comedy routines.

The show does best when it's funny or ironic or enraged; emotion is easier to convey than reason. The comedy routines about the endless battle against cockroaches, or the absence of black faces from the TV screen, or the "Courageous Awards" mockingly offered to famous figures, all are extremely successful. The songs are somewhat uneven, and sometimes disappointing. "Basic Black" is unquestionably the best in the show, an explosive song that declares: "I'm gonna free myself, I'm gonna be myself! In the style of basic Black."

The show is weakest when it comes to ideology, particularly its doctrine of the defiant underdog, the power and vigor of their singing comes from the gut, feeling of resentment and hostility, which makes very little sense when it is expressed in words. Why should the answer to racial discrimination be a radical discrimination by blacks against whites, a Negro separatism? This is the sort of question that "Walk Down Mah Street" does not deal with, especially not in any rational fashion. I question also the honesty of their attitude toward the audience, with its schizophrenic alternation between "the kin of the street" and "the kick in the groin." Nonetheless I recommend the show as an interesting and revealing experience.

Climb Every Mountain

Columbia Mountaineers
Escape To Wilderness

By LINDA LINDAY

Care to go on an expedition to Alaska? Probably not, but don't be scared off by the name Columbia Mountaineering Club — it isn't only mountaineering and it isn't just for Columbia. There are lots of activities Barnard girls can enjoy, and there are trips planned specifically so that beginners can come out and learn. Some of these are rock climbing, hiking, back-packing, canoeing, and illustrated lectures.

The club started as a rock climbing club, and this is still one of the most popular activities. Climbing is done at the Shawangunks, cliffs located about seventy miles north of New York City. People go by car (rides are arranged within the club) and spend one or two days of the weekend doing technical climbing with ropes, pitons and carabiners. These are provided by leaders who are trained and qualified. It is a popular misconception that the sport is a dangerous one: the Club hasn't had an accident in its three years of existence, and rock climbing has one-sixth as many accidents per contact-hour as skiing.

Soon after the Club started, hiking became part of the agenda. Although people are often surprised to discover this, there are many miles of beautiful trails within easy driving distance from New York and accessible by public transportation.

Back-packing is over-night hiking, carrying everything one needs on one's back. It requires more equipment, strength and skill than hiking, and usually more time, because trips often go to the Adirondacks or White Mountains. But for these same reasons it is more satisfying, since it is more remote and wild. Canoeing and canoeing are now part of the program. Canoeing does not mean lake canoeing, but following rivers like the Delaware downstream; and if your conception of canoeing is something like Howe Caverns, you may be surprised to find yourself wriggling through a narrow passageway.

If you answered yes to the original question, and do want to go on an expedition, the Mountaineering Club has that. In some of the stronger, more experienced and ambitious members from across the street are making plans for another expedition to Alaska next summer, this time to climb Mt. McKinley by the West Buttress. There is still another possibility. If the call of the wild is not likely to get you out of Morning-side Heights, you can come to one of the slide lectures which are given on campus throughout the year. For further information contact Linda Linday (268-9418 — Plimpton Hall) or Dave Ingalls (662-1873).

Dance-Drama Department Plans
Varied Program Of Campus Events

By FRANCIS HOENIGSWALD

The dance-drama scene at Barnard is one of lively and constant flux, experimentation and variety. For the past two years the Barnard Theater Company hired four professional actors to work with student therapists. The professionals gradually moved into the classroom as teachers and demonstrators. This year Mr. James, Director of Minor Latham Playhouse, and associate professor of English, hopes to bring in professional directors who will be "jobbed in" on a temporary basis. Professional actors will also be used in this fashion when no student can be found to suitably fill a role. Mr. James believes this constant experimentation is beneficial to the course of drama at Barnard; he is anxious also to work with new scripts, but doesn't get them as often as he would like.

Auditions will soon begin for "The Confederacy," a play by Sir John Vanbrugh, to open November 18. Although produced by the Barnard Theater Company, all interested students may audition. Mr. James would like to take the theater "out into the campus"; last year this was attempted through lunch hour productions in the James Room.

Dance

Art Bauman, member of the New York Dance Theater and a frequent performer at Barnard in the past, has been commissioned by Barnard to compose new works for the Dance Drama Workshop. He will direct Janet Soares, the force behind last year's Dance Uptown program, will be in charge of dance activities at Barnard. Announcements of future dance events will be forthcoming.

Yesterday, interested freshmen attended a meeting to set up Freshmen Workshops, groups who will work on scenes and short plays in a rehearsal situation to perfect their acting abilities. If a scene or play has been particularly successful in rehearsal, the groups will present it to the public. The workshops will be under the direction of Donald Face, who performed the same task so successfully last year. At that time about 30 freshmen participated. Similar workshops are being planned for upperclassmen, as in past seasons.

Mr. Jones and the Theater Company and Professor Uccello and the Spanish Department will cooperate in a production of Calderon's

"The Grand Theater of the World" to be aired in December at St. Paul's Holy Trinity Church. The groups may also premiere music by De Falla for the play. A Spanish play was produced in this manner last year. Mr. James believes a large number of Spanish majors who may not otherwise have been involved with drama will participate.

A program of dance is tentatively scheduled for November. An old English version of St. George and the Dragon has been selected for the annual Christmas Masque. A series of fifteen or twenty minute dramatic, dance and poetry performances are scheduled, as they were last year, for St. Paul's chapel on campus and St. Paul's Holy Trinity Church over a month.

Gilbert and Sullivan

The Gilbert and Sullivan Society under the presidency of Sarah Keeney is considering a production of "Patience," although no final decision has yet been reached. The independent Barnard-Columbia group performs annually one work of the famous operetta tenors.

Mr. Jones describes the living arts programs shown last year as "successful" until the disturbances, when most such activities were cancelled. ("Due to trouble at Columbia, 'Trouble in Tahiti' will not be seen" read one sign posted at the Barnard gates last year.) The Minor Latham director regrets the waste of time and effort on the part of students involved in these productions. If he can assemble the original cast of "Trouble in Tahiti" he may give performances of it this year. Mr. Jones hopes the variety of dance-drama events planned for the coming year will involve a large number of Barnard girls with differing interests and that will prevent cliques, a common feature of single drama organizations.

Drama Staff

For the first time Mr. Jones has a proctor staff to help him shoulder the work load of this varied program. Donald Face has been named Assistant Director, June V. Hayes ('68) acts as his secretary and gets Friday, and students Morcha Mahard, Ursula Green and Susan Anderson assist. Mr. Jones hopes the enlarged staff and varied programs will eventually lead to the creation of a major in Creative Arts encompassing dance, drama, Art History and other relevant subjects.

Milestones: Minor Latham

Professor Minor Latham

In 1954 the Barnard Theater was remodelled and renamed in honor of Minor Latham, Emeritus Professor of English since 1948. Since 1914 she brought theater to life for Barnard students through her stimulating lectures and her energetic patronage of dramatic activities on campus. Barnard honors site her "infectious grin," her "merry" classes and "rolling gag." Her personality left an indelible mark on Barnard.

Minor Latham lectured an Elizabethan Drama, produced Medieval mystery plays and became the "guiding spirit" behind the Wigs and Coes. Believing that plays were meant to be performed and not read, she produced any play written by one of her students, not just a selection of the best work. Such famous actresses as Helen Gahan, Agnes De Mille, Ruth Gordon, Jane Wyatt, Vera Allen, Alvin Karpis, Lucra Dana and Murie Hutchinson studied with Miss Latham. At her retirement she was Chairman of the English department. Minor Latham grew up in Harnersburg, Mississippi, received her B.A. in '30 at Mississippi State College, did graduate work at Bryn Mawr and obtained her Ph.D. at Columbia in 1915.

The Sixth New York Film Festival

By STEVE DITLEA

The New York Film Festival, which ended last week at Paul Harmonic Hall, provided an unusual experience. Viewing 24 films in twelve short days gave an insight into the nature of film which cannot be gained in any other way. The onslaught on the mind and the senses by so many stories, events, people, objects and sensations quickly produces a numbing of the rational impulse by which we normally judge films.

While there is a numbing of the intellectual judgment of individual films there is a heightened awareness of cinematic elements far more subtle than the plot gross characterization, photography or editing. We can appreciate acting as a subtle quality which makes Anna Karina's quiet portrayal of the innocence of La Religieuse seem every bit as overwhelming as the explosive and flamboyant performance by Pierre Clement in Partner or the acting of Marie Marc, the eighty-year-old grandmother in L'Enfance Nue as engaging as the voluptuous Jana Dragolova in Ceramics Summer.

The structure of the films becomes almost palpable making it possible to anticipate how a director will end a film or to predict the very shot he will choose to end his narrative. Sometimes it is with the beautiful symmetry of Renoir, repeating similar scenes at the beginning and end of Toni, or with the wry commentary of Gianni Amico's ending for Tropics in a ten second scene which reveals the entire meaning of the previous hour-and-a-half of film.

"Week-End"

The exposition of narrative with total disregard for real time, as practiced by Godard in "Week-End" becomes as valid as the moment by-moment exposition in Report on the Party and the Guests in which film and the Guests in which film time is exactly equivalent to real time. The narrative by anecdote in "The Red and The White," is as revealing as the linear plotting of "Faces".

With so many films crowding in upon the senses, there was an irrefragable urge to compare the films with each other and with other films, some only dimly remembered. Sometimes it is an obvious association "L'Enfance Nue" with "The Four Hundred Blow," both concerning a wayward boy, or "Partner" with "La Chinoise," both in similar style and with similar subjects.

Sometimes an entire film will bring back to mind one moment in another film, like "Deux ou Trois Choses," which is all about the metaphysics of language, and the short scene in "Made in USA" where a workman talks about language. Sometimes a single moment evokes a whole film, as when Lenu Peacock watching a movie in "Paris Under the Big Top" calls to mind the tragic "My Life to Live." A feeling may pervade a film—"Report on the Party and on the Guests" evokes the strange atmosphere of Bunuel's "Viridiana" though these two movies have very little in common. There is a danger in these comparisons and evocations, for they often obscure the unique and subtle qualities of individual films. If these cinematic associations have been described at length, it is to explain why critics like Andrew Sarris or Stanley Kaufman often indulge in name-dropping films, to the vast irritations of their readers.

"Partner"

Although the experience of a film marathon blurs the intellectual distinction between good and bad films, the rapid succession of films produces a sense that replaces the intellectual that sense is based on the criterion of revealing an element of real life the first time or in an original way. By this standard, even the most banal film might have a single moment which makes it great. "Faces," done with good acting in an imitation of cinema-verte style, would be just another good film about a stormy moment in a marriage if it were not for the remarkable moments of laughter in the movie. Thus laughter as the everyday hollow cackling of the pained social situation, the false sequence in difficult moments, the forced smiles; so much a part of life, yet never revealed so clearly or so truthfully on the screen.

Bartolucci

"Partner," a film which I did not like, managed to charm me because of Bartolucci's beautiful use of repetition in the dialogue; the result is a child-like sing-song, in which the words lose their meaning and become mere sounds, just as they often do in pop and commercial usage. "Twenty-four Hours in a Woman's Life," a truly abysmal film, did reveal a striking moment when a woman is attracted to a man because of his delicate and effeminate hands, a real-life phenomenon (the attraction of effeminacy to many women) that has never been so clearly shown in cinema.

So much for these initial remarks on the immediate, subjective response to the Film Festival. The second part of this review next week will give some more specific criticism of the films which are likely to appear in New York in the next few months.

Placement Office

(Continued from Page 3) of entertainment and it pays unusually well. If there is a strong enough indication of student interest, she said that she would advertise this service.

Mrs. Collins emphasized throughout the interview, that if students have specific talents or other ideas for jobs, she would be most willing to develop more jobs in those areas. The Placement Office is most receptive and willing to promote your interests and needs. It is a Barnard Service existing for you.

Regents Fellowships

The State Education Department is now taking applications for 840 Regents fellowships for graduate study in various subject areas beginning in September 1969. Applications must be filed by Dec. 1, 1968. Awards vary depending on the type of fellowship, the student's financial ability, and full or part-time study. Winners may receive up to $2,500 per year for most fellowships, and up to $5,000 per year for Herbert H. Lehman fellowships in the social sciences. For information concerning types of fellowships, eligibility requirements, and competition for the awards, contact the New York State Education Department, Regents Examination and Scholarship Center, 800 North Pearl Street, Albany, New York 12204.

Student Art

If you are interested in contributing sculpture, painting, graphic, drawings, photographs, even jewelry or ceramics to a student art show, contact Laurie Anderson 666-7094 after 10:30 p.m. Deadline for entries is October 15.

Vogue

There is still time to win a job on Vogue magazine in New York via Vogue's Prix de Paris which is now under way. This year's Prix de Paris, an annual career competition, is open to members of the Class of '69 who will graduate prior to September of 1969, receiving a bachelor of art degree, or its equivalent, from a college or university within the United States. Rules and requirements for entrants in the essay competition appear in the current issue of the magazine.

First-place winner in the Prix de Paris competition receives a year's employment with Vogue as a junior editor, and during that year will go to Paris with Vogue editors covering one of the culture collections. Second-place winner comes to Vogue for a six-months' junior editorship. And each of ten honorable-mention winners receives a $50 U.S. Savings Bond and top consideration for jobs on Vogue and other Condé Nast magazines.
