Seventeen Barnard Freshmen found new homes last weekend as they moved from their Reid Hall triples to doubles in the 600, 616, 620, and 49 Claremont dormitories

"This is a tremendous inconvenience for the freshmen," said George Gatch, Dean of Residential Life, yet she was pleased by the relatively large number of students relocated at a date earlier than had originally been expected. It was thought that only eight to ten freshmen would be relocated at this time

Housing for the three freshmen still in triple rooms and for the two who continue to share the commuter room on the first floor in Hewitt dormitory will be determined, Gatch said, "whenever spaces open up"

Vacancies were created by upper classmen in double rooms who transferred into single rooms, or by students who either failed to show up for registration or who decided to move off-campus

Most available housing was found in upperclassmen suites. Lalehmaz Ispahani said, "It's really no big deal. It would have been nice to have been with freshmen, but there are advantages to living with upperclassmen such as getting advice on classes." Ispahani's new roommates will be two sophomores and a senior

The decision as to which of the three roommates would relocate was made by the roommates themselves or according to the last contract received by the Housing Office

Though the housing problem regarding freshmen is almost resolved, the situation has not been easy on the new students. "It's unsettling to have to move now," said freshman Marianne Sampogna who said she spent most of her first month in college in the housing office. "It was a lot of wasted time and energy," she said. "I really liked the floor (6 Reid) and the girls and I'm upset to be leaving," she continued. Plans to move into a double with a friend also in a triple fell through when a senior moved into the room that the two girls had intended to share. "It's been a big disappointment all around and a bad experience for the beginning of college," said Sampogna

In an effort to avoid the problem of tripling in the future, there will be a committee to discuss and evaluate the housing situation "to insure that this kind of problem does not happen again," Gatch said. The policy offering all freshmen the option of housing will most likely continue

When asked whether a new Columbia dorm under proposal might serve as a solution to open up housing to more Barnard

The decision to reduce the Barnard physical education requirement from four to two semesters was greeted with mixed reactions. Many people jumped for joy, while others grumbled as they saw two semesters of unnecessary gym pass before their eyes. Then there were those students who didn't really notice. One thing is certain, however: The drastic decline in the number of students participating in physical education classes which some people had expected, did not occur

According to Lynda Calkins, Chairman of the Barnard Physical Education Department, the total number of class spots available in the Physical Education Department is 768, with 47 different courses being offered. Total enrollment at present is 702, 66 less than regular capacity. Of this number 355 are freshmen, and 347 are upperclassmen. Calkins said, "The people who are in the classes want to be there. It makes for a good learning atmosphere."

Fall semester enrollment statistics for courses offered by the dance department, Columbia University's exchange program, and the number of students participating in intercollegiate athletics were not available

According to Calkin's statistics, fifteen courses are over-enrolled with instructor permission, eight are operating below capacity with five spaces available in each class, while the rest are proceeding at normal capacity

Because of incomplete statistics, Calkins said it would be "incorrect at this time to make a direct comparison regarding this semester's enrollment with last semester's. When asked if the requirement change would affect enrollment in future years, Calkins said, "We won't be able to tell until a test year has gone by." She continued, "It is unfair to make predictions because of incomplete information. Everything is more speculative right now."

What Is Women's Studies at Barnard?

About three years ago, I was challenged by a male professor to take at least one women's studies class. The 1980's. All of a sudden, I was suddenly and fully enlightened. I was suddenly and fully enlightened. I was suddenly and fully enlightened. I was suddenly and fully enlightened.

OPINION

Letter to the Editor A Case for Self-Defense

To the Editor:

The issue of self-defense classes for women has been ignored much too long on the Columbia University campus. I think that is mainly due to the fact that the women should not be alarmed by talk of their self-defense especially in the neighborhood in which the school is situated. Personally, I feel that we should all discard whatever misconceptions we have of Harlem in and of itself because Columbia University is situated in a self-designed area called Morningside Heights. And Morningside Heights despite the picturesque portrait painted by the university for the benefit of incoming students is not alien to violence against women.

For the benefit of those who were not here last year the Barnard/Columbia Task Force on Violence Against Women released a report of frightening statistics of just how many of the women of this university campus are assaulted by men in a sexually violent situation. I am talking about RAPE. Without detracting any of the violence, humiliation and the horror that the male rape victim faces. I focus on that experience by women solely for the fact that I am a woman and that the violence perpetuated against a woman by a man has direct implications for women. A man that rapes a woman is likely to rape other women. I am forever included in that category of the "other" and so is every woman who has not encountered that violence.

The myth that the rapist is someone off the street who is someone we've never seen before is a lie. Yes, some of the rapists are ones who grab us off the streets as if we had no right to be there. But, a greater number of our sisters are coming out of their nightmarish silence and showing us the scars of violence left by their boyfriends, husbands, lovers, fathers, brothers. In other words, any man can rape us, provided that he can overpower us. In fact, it's not the rapist who is found on the streets, often he is lying in our beds. And the myth that we must rid ourselves of is that a woman can not say "no." The power that tells us to say "Yes" is the same one which tells us to say "No." After all, if a man claims that he can read our "vibes", he should respect our "No" with the same ardour that he acknowledges our "Yes."

The power to say "No" on the part of the woman means nothing if she has no idea of how to reinforce her words with self-defense tactics. We all know men who don't know the meaning of the word "NO", especially from a woman. If he went home mad this time, are any of us willing to take the chance of his recourse the next time. That is terrorization, and it is the first step towards a violent act. I hope to contribute to the elimination of the terrorization of the women of this campus, actual and potential, by proposing to the administration(s) the development of self-defense courses especially geared for women. I especially implore the respective Security Offices to take this matter very seriously for the simple reason that they can not always be where they are most needed.

Self-defense is training of the mind to react coolly to a situation that would otherwise paralyze you, it is a training of your body so that you develop your strong points, and become aware of your weak ones. It is a means of honing survival skills that will make you aware of your surroundings so that you do not endanger yourself by walking into a potentially dangerous situation. It is knowing your limitations and being able to assess those of your attacker in devising a plan of defense. It is a "silent weapon" used against the camouflaged attacker.

Many will claim that this letter will only create hysteria among women. I prefer hysteria that will lead to outrage over the little concern given to our state of mind, and the instability of our physical safety. I encourage outrage, because the position of this university has been outrageous-out to be expected. "NO LONGER" is the clear message that we must send the administration(s) on this issue. We are worth much, much more.

Abortion: Whose Choice?

by Anne Metcalf

The issue of abortion perplexes me. In my mind, there is a difference between an abortion in the first month and one in the seventh. Similarly confusing to me are the moral arguments maintained by women seeking abortions because the fetus is deformed or of the wrong sex. Since my views on abortion are not consistent, I prefer to remain pro-choice and let other women decide what's best for them.

The Reagan administration's position on abortion is pro-life. The pro-lifers, from either religious or intellectual stances, find abortion to be the unconscionable murder of unborn innocents. They rarely take exception, and permit abortions only when the woman's life is at stake. According to this line of thought, a fetus is a life regardless of how it was conceived. Therefore, there should be no differentiating between fetal matter resulting from rape or incest, and that produced by consensual sexual intercourse. If it's a life at stake, so be it.

However, there seems to be a slip in this pro-life attitude on the part of Vice-President George Bush. Bush is hesitant to deny the rape victim an abortion. Needless to say, this is not a logical progression of pro-life thought because it condones the extermination of an innocent fetus. Bush is making a moral judgment which I find troubling. Are pro-lifers who make exceptions in the case of rape or incest really concerned with the welfare of the pregnant woman, or are they taking a moral stance regarding the woman's participation in the fetus' conception?

I fear that two types of women are being defined "good girls" and "bad girls." The former are those who did not consent to the sexual act which caused their pregnancy, while the latter are those who complied. In other words, a differen

Ferraro Attacks Reagan's Foreign Policy

by Elizabeth Yeh

The crowd of nearly 3,000 at Hunter College was alive with anticipation as it waited for Democratic Vice-Presidential nominee Geraldine Ferraro to appear at a rally Monday, September 24

Prior to Ferraro's campaign speech, which covered a wide range of issues, former Representative Bella Abzug and actress Lauren Bacall addressed the gathering with fiery enthusiasm Abzug said,

"The doors are open for all of us! We are turning in our lipsticks for bigger sticks! We can win!" "I don't see how the American people can buy Ronald Reagan one more time," affirmed Bacall

As Geraldine Ferraro stepped onto the podium, the crowd bellowed with cheers The rousing atmosphere was temporarily marred by a few Reagan supporters who shouted, "Four more years!" They were quickly drowned with a chorus of "Down with Reagan!" Ferraro responded "Absolutely right!"

Ferraro thanked the Women for Mondale/Ferraro for their support, then launched an attack on Reagan "Don't tell us your policies are fair because they aren't!"

These comments brought wild applause from the audience Ferraro proceeded to fault Reagan's foreign policy "The secret war in Nicaragua is not secret and not legal It is not supported by the American people The time to end it is now!"

In reference to the conflict in Lebanon, Ferraro said, "Let's have a president that stands with diplomats before he stands with Mannes!"

At the end of the rally Ferraro brought her mother Antonetta, who was dressed in a hot pink suit onto the stage The crowd went wild

Speed Reading Helps Students Keep Pace

by Michelle Sorek

For the past week, students have been attending free speed reading seminars held at Ferris Booth Hall The seminars are sponsored by Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics

While for many the thought of reading tomes in only several hours seems to be a nearly impossible goal, one student was impressed with her reading increase "I went from 350 words per minute to 700, in ten minutes," noted Columbia College junior Juli Hancock Other students increased their words per minute by 100 to 150 words

Founded by elementary school reading teacher Evelyn Wood, the school boasts the White House staffs of both Presidents Carter and Ford among its graduates It was after the late President John F Kennedy's confession that he could only

keep pace with the news after taking a speed reading course that more people have been learning to read faster

The course, consisting of five three and a half hour lessons, is designed to increase both individual reading rates and comprehension scores By learning to overcome poor reading habits, such as wasted eye movement and sub-vocalization (reading quietly to oneself), the course is designed to show shortcuts to effective reading

The month-long course, offered on Sunday evenings at FBH is especially designed for college students It offers effective note-taking and outlining skills, in addition to speed reading techniques whereas a regular course emphasizes improving reading skills only Regular classes are offered in numerous locations throughout the United States

Women's Studies

But is the major versatile in the professional field after graduation? Miller felt there are just as many options for a Women's Studies major as for any other student including a variety of fields in communications public relations, social and commercial areas

There also is a positive feeling among student majors such as Ava Rose, who is a junior Women's Studies-English/French Major, under the Combined Major Program She chose this area of study because she wanted "women's studies to have a more serious place in our culture The Women Studies major is not a big group therapy session Feminist scholarship is serious and academic"

Another Women's Studies major, Anna Keller, is a junior with a combined program of English She feels Barnard has a "very strong program," and that the major has really helped her to "focus in" on her interests and concerns She added that everyone should take at least one Women's Studies course, because women have been half the population "forever"

There are a few problems facing the department, however, as Miller pointed out Currently there is no administrative staff in her office, so she relies on students to volunteer their time Another problem is tenure Most of the staff is of junior status and thus tenure remains uncertain In fact many good teachers, Miller claims, have already left the college for better offers Of course, there are many good things going on as well For instance, Women's Studies has emerged from its office, which was tucked away on the fourth floor of Barnard Hall, to a far more accessible location on the second floor-room 203—of the building Miller hopes that as the department expands, and as students become increasingly aware of the department's resources, that more women will actually use these resources

Sci-Fi Epic Creates Eighth Dimension

by Rebecca Johnson
Despite its fatuous little title, The Adventures of Buckaroo Banzai is one of the funniest and smartest movies this jaded moviegoer has seen in quite some time. By fecklessly mixing the comic book genre, oriental philosophy, Thomas Pynchon references, subversive anti-establishment doctrine and chic-neophyte rock 'n rollers, screenwriter Earl Mac Rauch managed to weave a lively tapestry of a sci-fi/drama movie.

Although I'm sure there was a plot lurking somewhere among the film's mis-asma of romantic vignettes, extraterrestrial creatures and general comic book suspensions of disbelief, unraveling its Byzantine intricacies would be hopeless. When John Lithgow first read the script he asked director W.D. Richter exactly which movie he was planning to make. Richter himself admits, "We sort of let the plot go in hopes that the characters themselves would be interesting enough". Indeed, the movie is like a jam session of creative energy fermenting away on screen.

The basic premise of the movie revolves around hero Buckaroo Banzai's (Peter Weller) unintentional freeing of aliens from the Planet 10. Imprisoned on earth since Orson Welles' 1938 "War of the Worlds" radio broadcast, the aliens are finally rescued after 50 years of captivity.

Although Welles' version was fictional, the movie hypothesizes that Welles was hypnotized to disclaim the actual truth of the broadcast.

When Buckaroo breaks through the eighth dimension by means of the "oscillator overthruster" these aliens become free to wreak all sorts of havoc on the world. Enter next the good aliens from the same planet who have come to prevent the return of the bad aliens. Interestingly enough the "good aliens" are dressed as Rastafarians with dread locks and silver lame jackets; while the "bad aliens" look suspiciously like secret service men or the typical 9-5 businessmen so prolific on Wall Street.

The film's hero, Buckaroo, is neo-Renaissance man extraordinaire. Neurosurgeon, particle physicist, rock 'n roll musician, jet car driver and comic book idol all rolled up into one Buckaroo gets to be both gorgeous and brilliant. Let's hear it for a male version of Jennifer Beales.

Other funny men in the cast include John Lithgow as Dr. Emilio Lizardo, an Italian physicist gone mad whose body is taken over by the aliens from Planet 10. Lithgow has gotten to be pretty good at playing deranged men (he went crazy in Twilight Zone, the movie too), but being deranged with an Italian accent adds a whole new dimension to the phenomenon.

There's also Buckaroo's Med school buddy "New Jersey" (Jeff Goldblum), who calls Buckaroo in for help with a problematic laser brain operation. During the operation, Buckaroo asks Goldblum to join his band. "Can you sing?" asks Buckaroo. "Not really, but I can dance", answers Goldblum. Goldblum only has to stand there to be funny as far as I am concerned. His mere presence inspires the phrase "comic genius".

W.D. Richter, the film's director, said in a recent interview, "Sometimes I think the film looks like a big coloring book". Not too surprising since Twentieth Century Fox is coming out with a line of Buckaroo Banzai comic books to capitalize on what it plans to be a great big sweeping success. But despite Buckaroo Banzai's creative bibliography—which does read something like the world's top ten grossing movies, Star Wars, Road Warrior, Captain Marvel, MTV, Sleeping Beauty—it's had to imagine the phenomenal main stream success of something like Indiana Jones for this film. Unfortunately, the very things which account for the movie's success, its spontaneity, its looseness, and its off-the-wall-humor, will be the things which will hinder its stature as blockbuster, box office success.

Student Apathy Disappears at the Center for World Affairs

by Beth Williamson
"Democracy is not merely a gift from United States Representatives Robert Torricelli (D-NJ) and an audience of approximately eighty people that gathered in Public Booth Hall last Monday night. Congressman Torricelli was on the Columbia campus to debate Representative James Cosentino (R-NJ) on the issue of United States involvement in Latin America. The debate was sponsored in part by the Barnard-Columbia Center for World Affairs, a group whose main post lies at the heart of Representative Torricelli's amendment. In the midst of criticism of "student apathy" on college campuses, the students who run the Center for World Affairs are attempting to make international affairs a living, breathing entity on the Columbia University campus.

The Center was originally founded in 1978 as a vehicle for students interested in sponsoring Model United Nations conferences. At these conferences, individual colleges represent the policies of various countries in the "real" United Nations. But over the past few years, the Center has experienced a surge of growth from its involvement with the Model United Nations; its program has expanded to include debates, films, and conferences of its own. And as its membership tripled, so has the club's ambition. A Board of Consultants, formed which includes such prominent people as world affairs as Representative Torricelli, United States Senators Bill Bradley and Alfonse D'Amato, and Jay Long, a member of the Department of Political and General Assembly Affairs at the United Nations.

In April 1984, the club received national press coverage when it brought the United Nations delegates from Iran and Iraq to the debate table for the first time in modern history. The event was attended by nearly three-hundred students. So much for student apathy.

The philosophy behind the Center for World Affairs is a simple one. The group wants to take politics out of a purely theoretical stratosphere and "bring it to life." According to Adam Tanner, the club's current president, the Center hopes to foster a "balanced, non-partisan interest" in international affairs. Tanner emphasizes that the club wants to avoid the common trap of espousing a single viewpoint. He cites the recent Latin American debate as an example of this broad-based approach: conservative, Reagan-supported Republican versus liberal, ex-Mondale aide. He hopes that the Center for World Affairs will be able to provide a forum for "living international affairs" within the context of a wide range of perspectives.

The Center's members will continue their efforts to educate the campus on issues of foreign policy this coming February as they present a Conference on International Strategic Affairs (CISA). The national conference will focus its attention on the nuclear arms race and U.S.-Soviet relations and will include participants such as William Colby, former director of the CIA, Senator John Warner of Virginia, and Dr. Seweryn Bialer, director of Columbia's own Research Institute on International Change. The program will incorporate three days of lectures, seminars, debates, and student discussions.

The success of the Barnard-Columbia Center for World Affairs is no fluke; rooted in student initiative and involvement, the Center is a dedicated group that has fought hard to extend its sphere of influence from the Carmen lounge (where its first meetings were held) to the entire University campus. A few years ago, the club had a handful of students, no speakers, and no funds. Now they boast a full-year program of prestigious guest lecturers and debaters sponsored by some two-hundred student members. The Center seems to have discovered an effective answer to the extremes of student indifference and campus protest in their active educational form.

For more information concerning the Center for World Affairs, contact either Adam Tanner or Consuelo Marquez, the Center's Vice President, at 280-3611. General meetings are held on Mondays at 9:00 PM in the Wallace Room of FBH.

tion between victims and accomplices. The "good girls" are allowed to have abortions, but the "bad girls" must pay for their actions and have the baby.

What kind of value judgments are being made here? What about the sexually-naïve pregnant adolescent, or the woman whose fetus is deformed? I have visions of the pregnant "acquaintance rape" victim desiring an abortion and being admonished in this way: "Well, since you invited him in for coffee, and did partake in the foreplay, we're not sure whether you should be allowed to have an abortion. After all, you were partially responsible for what happened..."

George Bush is making a potentially explosive definition of sexual morality in weighing the pregnant woman's level of consent in the sexual act. This attitude supports the hypocrisy that can result from such inconsistency.
