MOR BOARD 1958

To Millicent Cary McIntosh

under whose guidance the college has experienced ten vigorous years of experimentation, enrichment and sturdy growth.

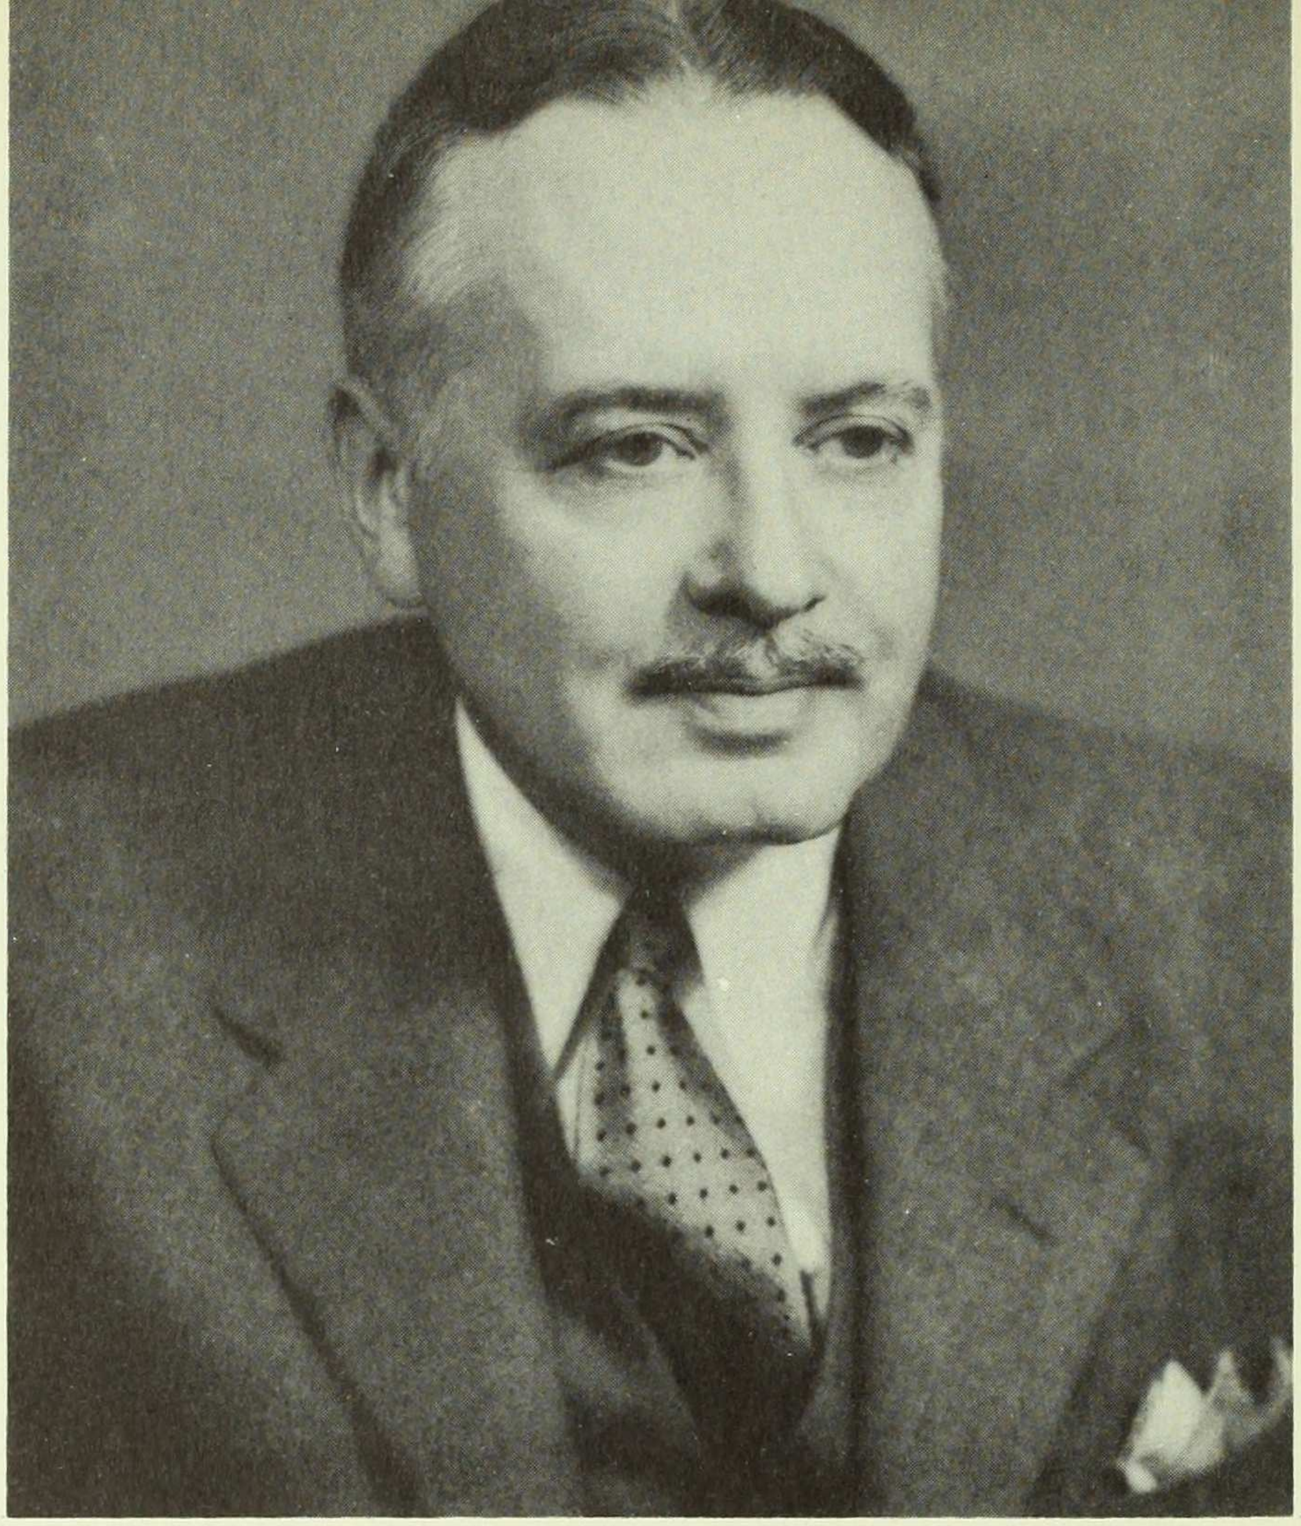
MILLICENT C. MCINTOSH, PH.D., LL.D., LITT.D., L.H.D.
President of Barnard College and Dean in the University

FOREWORD

A year at Barnard is a mosaic of people, studies, and diversions. These aspects of college life, multifarious as they are, possess in common a character of elasticity. For we are bound only by a tradition of change.

A year at Barnard, like a kaleidoscope, presents within its circle a multitude of patterns. Moving in a perennial framework, the pieces go where they will as they will, forming a composition at once unified and varied.

A year at Barnard is a composite of scenes and moods, the spirit of which our book has attempted to portray. The finished picture describes an education that prepares us for the further education we will receive as women and as citizens.



GRAYSON KIRK, PH.D., LL.D.
President of the University

Prospice

The events of the last few months have resulted in a re-evaluation of our current curriculum design. Greater stress on technological courses, probably operating to reduce emphasis on the liberal arts and the humanities can be expected. There are two points of interest here: one concerns the need for more scientific training; the other pertains to the effect of this increase in scientific training on other areas of education.

Our present facilities for educating scientific personnel are inadequate for the needs of a super-sonic age. To correct this shortcoming, the government has announced an increase in its own scientific research programs, and it is likely that many universities, as well as industry, will follow its example by offering additional scholarships, fellowships and research grants for people interested in the physical sciences. We can not argue that this concern with accelerating our technology is exaggerated, but we can wonder about its effect on the social sciences and the arts.

Scientific advancement is not sufficient to ensure a strong defensive or offensive position in a world beset with political and economical unrest. We can not afford to permit research and development programs in the social sciences to lag; we certainly should not, for example, emphasize nuclear physics at the expense of social research in underdeveloped geographic areas, any more than we should allow scientific research itself to slacken. It is at this point that the universities have a great responsibility. They must allow neither their curricula nor their faculties to become overly oriented toward the technological sciences. Care must be taken to prevent the non-technological faculties from being viewed as drones—entertaining but inutile. Science must not develop a monopoly on intelligence.

Alchemy

Poets and economists, politicians and song-writers have called it a number of things; the Columbia brochures call it a great university's great laboratory, in which we see and hear and experience many of the things a student reads about. But experience, here, is a double-edged as well as a key word—for while we experiment in our laboratory, the city, like a giant scientist, experiments with us.

Even as we go to see the plays of Shakespeare, the workings of capitalism on Wall Street, the foreign restaurants and festivals, the agents of government in the courts and on the platforms—even as we work at experimenting and experiencing, New York works changes on us. Perhaps the city's aim is to make us wiser; certainly its result is to make us different from what we would have been without it.

All of us have been, for some semesters at least, New Yorkers. And the probability is that even after we leave the city we will walk a little faster, talk a little differently, be more immune to noise. Perhaps we will always think of a building as most beautiful at night, and of a park as treacherous. Perhaps we will always feel guilty when we throw a candy wrapper on a street. And even if all these changes prove transitory, the city has probably changed something deep inside us, so that we will always think of every other city as only a town.

One wonders: in the last analysis, be it quantitative or qualitative, which experiments will have come to more, ours in New York, or New York's in us?

A New Discipline

The future now is a closet full of new and often constraining disciplines hanging among many indecisions. At first we may be tempted to go naked and avoid new constraints when we have dropped the old. We want freedom and individuality. But we want comfort too. And comfort requires that we be fully clothed. For our aim is not to reject the possibility of association with others.

Discipline is an often loathesome but always firm support to which visions and ideas turn. Only discipline can allow them time to materialize. Our new discipline will give shape to amorphous freedom and riotous individuality.

And so that our individuality and freedom will not dissipate itself and sit cowed in the corner of our closets we choose a discipline. If one is not ready made we must mold one to ourselves and carry it to best advantage. This will at first be burdensome, for the discipline, whether it be our home life or our career, will be self-inflicted.
